It's called the world's first commercial zoom lens. It sets a world record for zoom. It's the longest full-frame zoom available today – a whopping 29 times zoom. That's the equivalent of shooting almost four times the size of an average digital single-lens reflex camera at 29 times the normal focal length. It has a gold-plated tilt-shift mechanism, which makes you feel you're watching the scene from low to high. The 24mm lens is five-stop faster than that of the Sony 16-35mm F3.5-5.6 G Power Zoom Lens (PSL21) and Sony FE 28-70mm F2.8 SS MTF Limited (SEL2870STZ). It's only half an inch longer. Q: How do I search a TSV list for a specific data value? I have a TSV file in the following format: |DataID|DataType|DataValue |A|Mobile|12345 |A|Mobile|12345 |B|Desktop|23456 |B|Desktop|23456 I want to search this file, specifically for the string "Desktop" and get the index of the first occurrence. I can do this by reading each line and searching for the string, but I want to do this without reading every single line, as there are some 40,000 entries, and this is not a super-fast operation. I've read an answer here (as well as some other sources), but I don't understand how this applies to searching a TSV file for a specific value. Can anyone help? A: If your file (or its sample text) is in the same format as the data in your question, you can simply search the file like this: `import re search_pattern = r'Desktop' with open("test.txt") as fh: for line in fh: if re.match(search_pattern, line): print(line)` You can use this if DataValue contains only a delimiter. You can also use this if the format is different, but the search still matches. Ideally, however, you should be using a database. You can search using SQL, by using `IndexOf()`. I was just looking at the documentation for various databases. It appears that MySQL would allow you to do this in one query: `SELECT index_position FROM table WHERE DataValue LIKE %Desktop%`; Q: What is RVM (Ruby Version Manager)? Greetings, Can someone explain to me the difference between gem and rvm? A: RVM is a tool for installing and managing multiple versions of Ruby. Gem is a package manager for installing Ruby gems. As for a comparison of their features, read through the documentation for each. A: RVM is a tool for managing Ruby versions in one's computer. Gem is used to put Ruby libraries in source code so it can
