I was reading this article: ,and I found the expression: "A region between the superconductor and the normal conductor where the superconductor is normal." I was wondering what would be the name of that region? Thanks! A: It's called the proximity effect. Basically, the superconductor has a higher density of excited electrons than the normal conductor. These excited electrons lead to a smaller resistance in the superconductor. For example, in the case of a thin film of a superconductor, the superconductor is normal up to the thickness of the supercond d0c515b9f4

I am using fiddler to capture raw HTTP requests and responses of a domain. I am struggling to track all registration activities for this domain. More specifically, I would like to know the URLs of all the step that registration process goes through. For example, when I register a domain using godaddy and go to them.com, it goes through the following steps - Go to Registration Click on a step (I don't care which one) Step redirects to some location (e.g., Step2.html) Step finishes and I get the results. Is there a way to capture all these steps? Is there something in the HTTP headers that I can capture? Or is there a server side technique? A: To get the details of the registration process with names like step1.html, step2.html you need a tool like RegNow. My understanding is that they can log to disk the information about you and your registration. As you are trying to get the details of the registration process, are you also looking for the "comments" text that is returned to you when you register a new domain? Again I'm not sure of the tool to do this but on netblocks.org you can search for domains and look for the comments that are returned for each domain. a nickname for Eliza—that's what you say when you're talking about a special person that's hard to define. She is an almost perfect mixture of my mother and her mother.She's also a big fan of Buffy the Vampire Slayer (which makes sense, since her Mom wrote the intro song for the Buffy episode "Passion"). My mom loves it too. I can listen to any Buffy episode while she's shaving, but I've had to listen more than once, because she likes to
